

Chapter 168

Curious, they all opened the contracts and began reading.

They were surprised to find that the terms Lindsay offered far exceeded their expectations.

The profit-sharing ratio was comparable to what A-list artists at Harper Entertainment received, and the freedom was even greater.

This piqued their interest.

However, a high profit-sharing ratio would be meaningless without work.

So, they picked up the detailed development plans tucked at the back of the contracts. As they read through them, their expressions turned to one of astonishment.

The benefits outlined in the contracts were impressive, but what truly moved them were the personalized development plans.

They felt a sudden sense of recognition and respect.

Fiona, in particular, was almost moved to tears.

Lindsay had crafted detailed career plans based on each artist's strengths, skills, and preferences.

Fiona was the first to put down her contract and development plan, looking at Lindsay. "I really like the plan you've made for me. It's what I've always wanted to do since I entered this industry."

Fiona had enrolled in film school and entered the industry because of her genuine love for acting.

Lindsay's plan focused on acting rather than exploiting Fiona's controversial fame.

Previously, other companies had approached her with the intent to squeeze out her remaining popularity and value, which had frustrated and angered her.

She had refused their offers.

Lindsay nodded. "I've seen your performances. I know you truly love acting. Your acting skills are excellent, and you fit the role of a serious, talented actress."

Fiona smiled, a gesture she hadn't made in a long time since her fall from grace. "Thank you for recognizing me."

She continued, her tone shifting, "But you should also know my current situation. I was framed and smeared by that despicable couple, and now everyone sees me as a homewrecker. No director dares to cast me as the protagonist or even a good-nature supporting character. The only roles I get offered now are villains."

"Especially those particularly vile characters that the audience finds repulsive," Fiona continued.

Her agent had deliberately accepted such roles for her, and she took them due to contractual obligations and her love for acting.

She wanted to experience and portray different characters, even the evil ones.

However, playing these roles only made the audience dislike her more, further damaging her reputation.

"If you sign me, you might end up being dragged down and criticized alongside me," Fiona warned.

Lindsay was not only the studio owner but also an artist.

The despicable couple was always watching, ready to sabotage her comeback.

"The Harper brothers might use me to tarnish your reputation too."

Though Fiona wanted to continue acting, she didn't want to harm others in the process.

Listening to Fiona's concerns, Lindsay felt even more assured about her character.

She valued potential but prioritized integrity above all.

Smiling nonchalantly, she said, "I've already considered all these factors. If I'm not worried, why should you be?"

With confidence radiating from her, she declared, "Our studio will clean up your reputation and bring you back to the spotlight. We'll make sure those despicable people pay for what they did to you. We'll return every blow they dealt you."

Lindsay had already devised a plan to help Fiona clear her name and, in the process, further embarrass Oliver.

Her words surprised not only Fiona but also Joshua and Hector.

They were curious about how Lindsay planned to achieve this.

Even Harper Entertainment's top agents might struggle with such a task.

After all, more than a year had passed, missing the prime opportunity to clear Fiona's name, and the couple had fabricated solid "evidence" against her.

Restoring her reputation and making a comeback would be an enormous challenge.
