

Chapter 173

In Oliver's office.

After hearing the agent out, Oliver frowned. Wasn't Melvin's drama shelved?

Melvin had previously approached Harper Entertainment for investment but had been turned down.

The agent replied, "I heard someone has invested in his film, doubling the previous amount. As soon as the funds were in place, Mr. Price resumed filming."

Oliver was surprised. "Who would be foolish enough to invest double? They must be out of their mind."

He had little confidence in this drama, which was why he hadn't cast any C-list actresses for the supporting roles.

The only reason he remembered the drama was because Lindsay liked the supporting role. If it weren't for the sudden funding issue, he would have secured that role for her.

The agent continued, "It's rumored to be a new studio. The investor also insisted on not using any Harper Entertainment artists. Mr. Price removed two of my artists from the cast because of this. I only sent them to gain some exposure; otherwise, I wouldn't have bothered with that drama."

Attempting to provoke him further, the agent added, "They dare to slap Harper Entertainment in the face. This is a direct insult to both you and Mr. Harper."

Oliver didn't care much about the two small-time artists being dropped, but the agent's last remarks, though clearly meant to incite him, did annoy him.

He sneered. "Who dares to offend us?"

The agent replied, "I haven't found out the specifics yet."

"Hmph, let's see how this fool loses money. When that happens, we'll laugh in their face," Oliver said with narrowed eyes.

"I'll make sure that from now on, Melvin's projects won't get any artists from our company. And there's no chance we'll invest in any of his work."

There was no need to entertain further discussion with a director lacking connections and failing to understand his position.

The agent felt somewhat appeased. "That's the right approach."

Seeing that Oliver was busy, the agent decided not to linger and left the office.

Oliver quickly put the matter aside.

That afternoon, Lindsay met with Fiona, who brought her computer. She also provided the email account and the times and locations for the surveillance footage.

At the same time, Jenny, accompanied by a lawyer, officially signed Fiona, Joshua, and Hector to the studio.

After returning home, Lindsay restored the shredded and deleted photos and videos from Fiona's computer. She then recovered the deleted emails. Additionally, she paid to obtain backup data of the surveillance footage and restored the deleted videos.

Finally, Lindsay used a new phone with an unregistered SIM card. She downloaded a messaging app and created a new account.

She added Fiona's ex-boyfriend, Vincent Cooper, as a friend and used hacking techniques to ensure he accepted the request. She sent an emoji, and when Vincent asked who she was, she hacked into his phone and all connected electronic devices.

Lindsay found the deleted chat history between him and Fiona, as well as his conversations with the actual interloper.

She took screenshots and manipulated his phone to send them to her new phone's anonymous email account.

She then deleted all traces from his devices.

Lindsay usually didn't hack into others' devices, but she made an exception for such scum. She was merely uncovering the truth and making them face the consequences of their actions, using their own methods against them.

After saving the screenshots, Lindsay researched reality shows and selected a high-profile, long-running outdoor live reality program.

big sale: 100 bonus free fou you get it