

Chapter 51 A Sky-High Price of 21 Million

When Shirley heard Frank's bid, she was extremely pissed. The reason why Frank continues to bid for the diamond must be for that shameless woman, Tamara Randall! I still remember how humiliated I felt back then, so I have to take revenge on her!

And so, Shirley shouted, "Nineteen million."

The crowd couldn't help but burst into an uproar upon hearing the fierce bidding from both parties.

Although a pink diamond was indeed a rare gem, a diamond of that size could still be found in the market—at a high price, though. So, 18 million would be the maximum amount it could go up to. Therefore, the obviously overpriced bid was no longer purely to bid for the item, but merely to win the auction out of anger!

Tamara lifted his chin to gesture at Frank to continue raising the bid card. "Twenty million."

"Twenty-one million!" Shirley continued. This time, she merely raised the bid by 1 million.

After all, spending 21 million to buy a pink diamond was actually quite tough for her.

Just as Frank was about to continue raising the bid card, Tamara held his wrist.

He turned to her in puzzlement. "Don't worry about money. I still have some savings—"

Before he managed to finish his sentence, she shook her head, darting a look in Shirley's direction with a gloating smile. "The diamond doesn't cost 20 million. Just let her be if she likes to waste money for nothing. We won't be doing the same."

Upon seeing the mischievous smile on her face, Frank shrugged and put down the bid card.

He remembered that he had a similar pink diamond at home, but somewhat bigger than the one for auction. Since Tamara fancied pink diamonds, he could get it from his house and give it to her.

"Twenty-one million. Going once, going twice, going thrice, sold!" After announcing the highest bid price, the auctioneer brought down the hammer and exclaimed, "This is the highest bid we have tonight. Congratulations, Miss Goldie, for your success in bidding for the pink diamond!"

Shirley, who successfully won the bid for the pink diamond, looked at Tamara with her nose in the air. At that moment, the former felt incredibly complacent about the result.

It doesn't matter if Frank likes her, nor does it matter if they're married and have a son. He's reluctant to even buy her a pink diamond that she likes. In the end, the item fell into my hands.

Upon noticing Shirley's gaze, Tamara rolled her eyes at the woman. Thereafter, Tamara stopped paying attention to her.

All the items for auction after that were nothing spectacular. Although Tamara was not in the mood to continue participating, she didn't leave early and remained seated until the end.

Soon, the auction ended.

The successful bidders rose up and made their way toward the stage. When Shirley passed by Tamara, she even gave her a smirk.

All the profit made in the auction would be used for public welfare and charity, and both the buyers and sellers would go on the stage to receive awards given by the charity.

As soon as Shirley stepped onto the stage, she saw Tamara following her from behind.

She curled up the corner of her lips and mocked, "How shameless are you to be able to stand up here even though you didn't buy anything! So what if you are together with Frank, when you can't even get a pink diamond after cracking your head for it?"

"Is that so? Miss Goldie, are you satisfied with that pink diamond?" Tamara impassively asked in a tone that gave nothing away.

"Of course I am!" Shirley unhesitatingly replied. It was a diamond that she managed to snatch from Tamara, so she was more than satisfied with it.

"In that case, please pay the price. It costs 21 million. You may take out your card," Tamara continued.

"What?!" Shirley was stunned when she heard that.

"For the pink diamond that you bid for, of course. Are you not going to pay when there's so many witnesses around?" Tamara chuckled, and her eyes even contained a hint of pity for the other woman.
