

Chapter 124 Copy The Data

"Am I really that cold? Why are you so afraid of me?" Eliam hadn't realized his image would be so negative in Rhonda's eyes.

"I'm just saying you're not the tender-hearted guy I typically like. You come across more like a domineering CEO, alright?"

Rhonda turned to face Eliam, adding, "Actually, you do resemble an overbearing CEO, especially when you're angry."

"If I were truly a bossy CEO, would I let you be so bold in my presence?" Eliam glared at Rhonda.

"True, so you just have a similar appearance to a domineering CEO."

The two chatted and laughed along the way to the Sloan Corporation branch office. Upon entering, they sensed something was amiss.

Eliam took a phone call and informed Rhonda that Daniel was looking for her.

Upon reaching Daniel's office, Rhonda saw his distressed expression.

"I heard Dolores committed suicide, right?" Daniel inquired.

"Yes, she jumped from the hospital's top floor where her brother used to be last night." At the thought of that scene, Rhonda was still trembling with fear.

"This morning's news reported that our company drove her to suicide, and it revealed her suicide note, claiming that our company falsely accused her of stealing technology information, so she chose to end her life." Daniel didn't anticipate such an event.

"How could this happen?" Rhonda was convinced there was someone else involved.

"Her letter is with me. She wrote that if anyone pressured her again, she would die in front of that person." Rhonda retrieved Dolores' letter from her pocket and handed it to Daniel.

Daniel read the letter multiple times, then said, "I suspect the person who drove Dolores to her death is somehow connected to her alleged theft of our company's information."

Rhonda shared his suspicions.

"So, what do you want me to do?"

"I'd like you to help us find that person." Daniel expressed his thoughts.

"The technical data Dolores had access to is only surface-level, but I require you to spread the news that it's core information that has been leaked."

"Do you want me to lure the person behind all this out?" Rhonda quickly grasped Daniel's intention.

"Yes, I believe that since Dolores was close to you, those people might approach you to obtain the information she stole."

Daniel's expression turned serious. "Miss Horton, we seek your help because of your connection to Eliam, and it's crucial for us to identify this individual. Perhaps you're unaware that Glory Games has suffered frequent technology thefts. Counterfeit games appeared before their official release, forcing them to eventually sell the company. Additionally, customer data was stolen from Eden Accounting a few days ago. I suspect they're targeting us now." Daniel voiced his concerns.

Rhonda considered the situation. Even if she wasn't helping for Sloan Corporation's sake, she had to uncover the person responsible for Dolores' sake.

So Rhonda agreed to help Daniel.

She approached Dolores' workstation and began examining the files on her laptop.

Just then, Estelle approached.

"Rhonda, Margret wants you to organize the data on Dolores's computer, save it to a CD, and bring it back to the company," Estelle informed her.

Rhonda was somewhat taken aback.

"This computer is one of Dolores' personal possessions. I haven't found any company-related information on it," Rhonda responded.

"I don't know. I'm just passing Margret's message. She also mentioned that the company might end its partnership with Sloan Corporation due to Dolores, and we could be pulled out soon," Estelle explained.

"Really? When did Margret tell you? Why didn't she call me directly?" Rhonda asked, puzzled.

"Maybe she couldn't reach you."

"That's unlikely." Rhonda glanced at her phone and said, "Let me give her a call."

Estelle's expression shifted subtly.

Rhonda tried to call Margret, but there was no answer.

"Rhonda, Margret might be in a meeting right now," Estelle suggested.

"How about this, you copy all of Dolores' computer files onto a CD, and I'll deliver it to Margret later."

"But there are some documents related to Sloan Corporation in those folders. If I put them on the CD, Sloan Corporation might not be pleased, right?"

"Well, you did say this is Dolores' personal computer, so I don't think Sloan Corporation has any claim to it, correct?" Estelle had arrived late that day, and Rhonda had already turned on Dolores' laptop by the time she came in.

"But I found numerous documents pertaining to Sloan Corporation on it." Rhonda looked through them with a serious look.

At that moment, Estelle tried to take a look at the laptop.

Rhonda immediately closed the laptop.

"I just saw some core information about Sloan Corporation on the computer..." Rhonda's face turned pale. "I believe this computer should be handed over to Sloan Corporation."

"No, no, what if there's something related to our Eden Accounting on it? I think we should copy the files onto a CD and let me take it back to Eden Accounting. If there's any information about Sloan Corporation, Margret can decide what to do. That way, if anything goes wrong, it won't be on us, right?"

"You have a point. I'll do it," Rhonda agreed and asked Estelle for a blank CD.

Soon, a CD containing the laptop's data was prepared.

Estelle reached for it, but Rhonda held onto it.

"I think it's best if I deliver this CD to Margret myself," Rhonda insisted.

"You don't trust me?" Estelle seemed hurt.

"It's not that. Given the media frenzy surrounding Dolores' situation, I believe we should err on the side of caution," Rhonda clarified.

"Well, you're the director, so the decision is yours." Estelle stormed out, slamming the door behind her.

Rhonda revisited Dolores' laptop files and deleted all information related to Sloan Corporation.

At this time, she inadvertently clicked on the photo album on the computer and saw a private photo. It was a photo of Dolores in a swimsuit and George by the sea.

George?

Rhonda's mind raced to the news about George spending a night with a mysterious woman in a hotel.

She searched for the article but only found a headline, the content had been removed.

Clearly, someone powerful was backing George.

Examining the photo, Rhonda speculated that Dolores might have been George's secret lover.

But how was this connected to Dolores stealing project information from Sloan Corporation?

After being sensationalized for over a day, the news about Sloan Corporation driving an Eden Accounting employee to suicide spread rapidly.

Unexpectedly, Sloan Corporation decided to sue Eden Accounting.

The reason was that an Eden Accounting employee had stolen Sloan Corporation's core technical information. Sloan Corporation not only planned to terminate its partnership with Eden Accounting but also demanded compensation for their losses.

On the afternoon of the following day, Margret urgently called Rhonda back to the company.

"Rhonda, Estelle mentioned that you copied all of Dolores' computer documents onto a CD, right? Where is the CD?" Margret inquired coldly.

"I want to know who's asking for this CD." Rhonda didn't even believe Margret now.

"Were you aware that Sloan Corporation filed a lawsuit against Eden Accounting this morning?"