

Chapter 664 Narrow-minded Man

"Ms. Sherman, a respected investor visited our school today, and suggested he could make a contribution and donate some advanced equipment. Our school's development is depending on him. Can you please accompany him?"

The principal's wrinkled face was close to Melissa's as he whispered into her ear.

Even in his old age, Melissa thought he was somewhat cute as he pled.

"Alright, but I don't know if I'm going to be much help. I'm not a great communicator."

"That doesn't matter. If you aren't doing good in the conversation, hand it over to us. As long as you don't say anything wrong to offend the big shot, there won't be a problem."

Melissa knew now more than ever that whatever she wanted, even if it was the stars in the sky, the principal would find a ladder and grab them for her.

After all, the principal was quite rushed to ask for her assistance.

She wasn't surprised though as it was difficult for normal people to talk to Everett.

And it seemed that he had no intention of communicating with normal people at all anyway.

"Mr. Mayfield, this is our new teacher. You can call her Ms. Sherman."

Everett looked up to the woman in front of him knowing that she was purposefully asked to join him. He said intentionally, "I don't think Ms. Sherman is very happy to be here. Did you ask her to join us against her will?"

The principal stepped in quickly to manage the situation. "Of course, she's happy. It's our great honor to have you here, and the teachers and students are excited that you're here."

Melissa knew she would get tired of the principal's nagging eventually, fully aware that he loved to flatter every guest, speaking with primarily pleasantries. She didn't feel the same.

She believed that if the principal was given enough time, he would definitely begin praising Everett.

Once the principal had arranged the meeting, Melissa sat down next to Everett.

The seat was quite close, and Melissa's legs inadvertently touched Everett's.

Everett didn't like this.

He said gloomily, "Ms. Sherman, do you often attend social engagements like this?"

Melissa curled her lips. It was rare that she would see her colleagues at school.

She only had five classes a week, and as long as she arranged them well, she would only have to work two days a week.

She heard the jealous tone in Everett's voice, and decided to take the opportunity to tease the narrow-minded man.

She said purposefully, "Of course, I have social engagements quite often, so you can rest assured that I'll accompany you today. I won't make you embarrassed or unhappy."

The principal smiled. Melissa had told him before that she wasn't a good communicator. Weren't her words pleasant enough?

Everett didn't respond happily to Melissa's words, to the principal's surprise. Instead, his face darkened.

"Then can I regard that Ms. Sherman is actually a party girl at this school?"

The staff was confused and concerned to hear this accusation.

People had heard that Everett had no interest in other women and hadn't been involved in any scandals. He only had an ex-wife and an ex-girlfriend. Recently, a new relationship was beginning to get exposed.

How could such an arrogant man take to Melissa like that? Were all the
