

Chapter 668 The Principal Feels Embarrassed

The principal wore a startled expression. He felt like he had been tricked at that moment.

"You're suggesting that the two of you are..."

Melissa approached Everett and respectfully lowered her head to explain the situation to the principal.

"In fact, we are married. This investment in our school also has a connection to me."

The principal's face paled, displaying evident embarrassment over his previous remarks.

He placed a finger on his nose. "Melissa, being Mr. Mayfield's wife is not something to be embarrassed about. Why didn't you inform us earlier?"

"It wasn't the right time," Melissa wanted to explain. "I didn't want others to know about it. I hope you can keep it confidential, sir."

The principal nodded before he turned to look at Everett apologetically.

"Mr. Mayfield, I genuinely had no knowledge of your relationship with Melissa, so please disregard my earlier comments. Our school is truly in need of this investment."

Immediately he regretted making that statement.

Everett reassured him. "Don't worry. We already have plans to invest in your school. I believe you are a competent principal."

The headmaster had earned Everett's favor.

"From this point forward, we won't trouble you any further. I believe having Melissa by your side will be more beneficial than our involvement."

The principal gave them a knowing glance. He then turned around and departed, leaving the two of them alone.

"Why didn't you inform me about the investment? I only learned about it today," Melissa said with a touch of discontent in her tone.

Everett consistently pursued his own approach to things.

Luckily, the principal was an understanding individual.

"I was concerned that if I'd mentioned my arrival today, you might have deliberately avoided me."

Everett's voice turned hoarse, sounding completely opposite from his confident image just moments ago.

Melissa looked up and noticed signs of fatigue around his eyes. It appeared he hadn't been getting proper sleep in the past few days.

Their departure had deeply affected him, delivering a heavy blow.

"Don't blame the children. They require time to adapt. Furthermore, please refrain from visiting the kindergarten in the future to avoid disturbing their routine. I don't want their normal lives to be disrupted," she said.

"How is that considered a disruption? They're my children. I may not be a good father, but I won't give up. I will work towards earning the forgiveness of our children," he retorted.

It was evident he genuinely cared about the children, as he persisted in his efforts to obtain their forgiveness despite facing numerous setbacks.

This marked a complete departure from his previous demeanor and personality.

"What about you? Did you miss me these past few days?"

The man's gaze was penetrating, as if he sought to peer into her soul and comprehend her genuine thoughts.

"Well..."

Melissa was preoccupied with the tasks of moving and settling in during these past few days. This caused romantic matters to be temporarily set aside.

While Melissa didn't want the children to harbor ill feelings towards Everett, she also believed he bore responsibility for the past.

He should have some consequences to his actions.

"So, let's go for a walk. The school is very beautiful," she suggested.

Recognizing that further discussion would be unproductive Melissa made the decision to temporarily let go of the topic. Going for a stroll would not only lift their spirits but also provide a welcomed respite.

Everett smiled and raised one eyebrow. He suddenly exuded a captivating charm.

"So, you came here to accompany me as the principal mentioned?"
