Chapter 104

Outside the hospital, when Kelvin arrived at the hospital, he was naturally drawn to the line of black cars at the hospital's entrance. With so many car keys, even four security guards couldn't manage them all.

He glanced around and saw that all the cars were from Horizon Tower, but none of them were from his own family.

That meant Tinley hadn't come yet.

Kelvin instructed the driver to drive in and park in the parking lot inside,

The soundproofing in the car was good, but once they got out, they could hear the continuous broadcast inside the hospital

"Please, Head of the Department of Otolaryngology Mr. Ryan Carter, Deputy Director Mr. Max Bennett, Deputy Director of Otolaryngology Mr. Lucas Harris, Chief Physician Mr. James Grant, Chase Anderson: Deputy Director of Orthopedics... immediately report to the CT room on the second floor of Valore Building and wait outside."

"Please the Head and Neck Surgery Department..."

There were no loudspeakers in sight, but the sound was echoing throughout the entire hospital.

The broadcaster's voice was calm yet carried a barely noticeable urgency, with the tone of the last sentence in each segment being emphasized.

The patients in the hospital all looked up, their faces filled with surprise as they looked around.

Nina got out of the car and saw that Kelvin was about to leave with Yvonne in his arms. She hurriedly took two steps forward and asked in a hurry, "Mr. Adler, should we come with you?"

Kelvin stopped and looked back at her. Although the broadcast kept playing, his words still reached Nina's ears clearly and powerfully.

"Go to the place mentioned in the broadcast, the Holmes family and your child are there."

Nina was stunned for a moment, and as she looked up at the gap in the building, Kelvin had already left with Yvonne.

She opened her mouth to ask more, but her arm was grabbed.

Looking back, it turned out to be Robert with a sullen face.

He shook his head, dragged Nina to the car without a word, and closed the door before speaking.

"Do you remember I told you before that the Holmes family has a missing child, three and a half years old, the same age as Marian?"

"I remember, but this has to do with..." Before she could finish her sentence, Nina realized it. She was still with her mouth open, but her eyes suddenly widened, and she froze in shock.

She turned her head stiffly, trembling as she uttered a sentence.

"Marian... Marian is the lost child from the Holmes family!"

Robert nodded, his tone complicated. "From what we've seen so far, it's probably true."

The car became quiet. Oliver sat in the front passenger seat, glanced at her parents' expressions, and swallowed the words of complaint.

'Marian is a child of the Holmes family?'

But he couldn't do it right now. If he did, he would be beaters by mixed donkies.

Oliver held back and turned to look out the window.

He followed Jeremy's figure and saw the direction they were heading towards it was a bidding with a very coregio red sign next to it.

"DNA Test Center?"

Oliver murmured these words quietly,

If Marian is the Holmes family's daughter, why is Mr. Adler taking his child to the DNA Text Center?

The DNA Test Center was located within the hospital, but it operated as an independent institution. It was established here due to the high demand from hospital visitors.

In an empty lounge, Kelvin sat on the sofa with Yvonne in his arms, the smell of disinfectant filling the air around them.

A young nurse walked in, holding a clean syringe in her hand.

As she spoke, her attitude was a bit cautious, and she carefully asked, "Sir, should we draw blood for the child now?" Kelvin hummed, unbuttoned Yvonne's coat, and revealed her thinly covered arm in a light autumn shirt.

He rolled up her sleeve and let the nurse draw blood.

"Daddy..." Yvonne looked at the cold, silver needle approaching her arm.

She tilted her little face up, her soft, sweet voice full of confusion.

"Haven't we seen this before?" Last time at another hospital, she also had her blood drawn, but the syringe didn't look quite the same as this one.

Kelvin raised his hand to cover her big, blinking eyes. As Yvonne hurriedly closed them, her long eyelashes brushed against his palm.

She was still confused when a slight prickling pain spread across her arm.

Since her vision was blocked, she felt a bit uneasy and instinctively raised her hand to push away the large hand covering her eyes.

"Daddy, something is biting me!"

After pulling his hand away, she turned her head to look at the spot on her arm that hurt. A cotton swab wiped over it, leaving only a small red dot.

Kelvin dressed her back up and took the freshly drawn blood from the nurse's hand.

Now, they just needed to wait for the Holmes family to send over Tinley's blood sample. He took half of it for Yvonne's test.

The Holmes family acted quickly. Before long, a commotion sounded outside. Jeremy opened the door and took a glance. then turned back to the room and said in a low voice, Dad, they're here. It's Ian."

He had the best relationship with Ian, so he called him Ian, while he addressed the other two according to their seniority.

Kelvin placed Wonne on the sofa and instructed, "Watch over your sister. I'll go get it from him."

He opened the door, and the hallway was filled with men dressed in black.

To ensure the accuracy and reliability of the DNA test, no one was allowed to approach during the waiting period for the results

Kelvin couldn't enter either. He stood outside and called out Ian's name.

Ian was talking to the examiner when he heard the voice and turned his head.

"Let him in," he said to the men in black blocking Kelvin.

Seeing the blood sample he was about to hand over to the appraiser, Kelvin approached and stopped him, saying, "Give me half

Ian was stunned. He thought he had misheard and looked at him in confusion. "Why do you need my sister's blood?"

Kelvin didn't answer. He saw that the tube was filled with plenty of blood, enough for several tests, which was why he asked for some.

If it was done together with Marian's, there was a possibility of mixing up the test results. Doing it separately was the safest option.

Therefore, he was very persistent, staring intently at the tube of blood. "Give me some."

Ian frowned, lifted his gaze, and locked eyes with him for a few seconds.

His eyes were dark and deep, like storm clouds pressing down on the sea before a tempest.

There was no other emotion, just a pure, unbroken darkness.

Retracting his gaze, Ian handed the sample to the appraiser while instructing. "Use a separate sampling tube to divide some for him."

The appraiser divided the sample in front of both of them.

He used a syringe to draw out half of the sample, transferred it into an empty tube, and then labeled it with identifying information.

This half portion of blood was finally handed over to Kelvin.

He held it in his palm, patted Ian's shoulder, and said in a deep voice, "Thank you."

"I'm trusting you." Ian didn't look back, urging the appraiser to hurry while taking a moment to speak to him.

If it weren't for trust, he would not possibly give him his sister's blood.

This institution had more than one testing lab. After Kelvin left, he took the two tubes of blood with him and went to another lab upstairs.

Compared to the one downstairs, his testing appeared much more perfunctory.

There was no one standing outside the door, nor was there strict supervision from start to finish. After handing the samples to the appraiser, he returned to the lounge.
