

The Growth 366

Chapter 366 - 12: Grasping the Dragon with One Hand

Since the third generation of the Dragon Race, subsequent dragons have been researching how to truly transcend reincarnation.

For this purpose, the dragons continued to secretly learn the various technologies and concepts of the Mountain and Sea Civilization, attempting to use its research findings to perfect their own path.

During this period, the dragons have taken countless wrong paths and encountered numerous failures.

The situation developed to the point where even the dragons themselves were too lazy to remember how many generations of dragon individuals currently existed.

The only certainty is that the various attempts of the dragons did indeed achieve results.

That was an inevitable accident, and also the result of countless dragon attempts.

It was an unknown generation of Dragon Race that, when exploring the essence of the soul, unexpectedly merged its body and soul into one.

Or more accurately, the dragon "overlapped" its physical and soul dimensions together.

Since then, the dragon's body has been the soul, and the soul has been the body, becoming an existence akin to the Heaven and Earth Ghosts and Gods.

Moreover, residing in Yu Yuan, the dragon is at the intersection of the Netherworld and Mountain and Sea Realm.

The dragons can freely shuttle between the Netherworld and the Mountain and Sea Realm.

The Nether Spring constructed by it has even become a direct passage connecting the two realms.

It was also from that time onwards that the dragon's body broke the biological limits, and could constantly grow and transform like a spirit body.

However, the dragon could feel that it had only broken the limits of the physical body.

Its lifespan still had no difference from ordinary dragons, even slightly reduced due to genetic mutations.

Let alone those companion individuals sharing the same memories as itself.

Even normal dragons might live a bit longer than it does.

Under such circumstances, the dragon turned its attention towards the companion individuals and other dragons.

And after countless experiments and failures, the "Ghost God Egg," born from the Dragon Race but naturally able to transform into a spirit body, emerged.

The dragon now lingering within the Nether Spring is no longer the same dragon that broke the boundary between body and soul.

It is a special individual hatched from the "Ghost God Egg" thereafter.

It inherited all of the dragon's abilities while also rectifying the defect of reduced lifespan...

In a certain sense, the newborn individual has already departed from the category of the Dragon Race, becoming a brand-new race.

If it weren't for the extremely stringent conditions required to nurture a "Ghost God Egg," even the dragons themselves wouldn't dare ensure they could cultivate a qualified new generation.

Newborn dragons might have long replaced those ordinary individuals.

Despite this, each Azure Dragon Island that has nurtured a "Ghost God Egg" is personally overseen by the companion dragon individuals.

Those companion individuals, though unable to become special individuals capable of freely shuttling between the Netherworld and Mountain and Sea Realm like the dragon, have indeed inherited the complete memories of previous dragon generations.

Other than the soul, these companion individuals are virtually indistinguishable from the special individuals.

In this sense, the current dragons have perfectly achieved the goal of the first generation—to possess the ability to incarnate endlessly, like the Goddess of Death.

Of course, the two are only similar in appearance; in essence, they are fundamentally incomparable.

After so many years and generations of evolution, the memory fragments of previous dragons have long been scattered throughout the entire race.

The "previous generations" here refer not only to those dragons that successfully reincarnated.

But also those who inherited previous memories but derailed or failed for various reasons, ultimately unable to complete reincarnation.

They can be said to be failures.

But the dragons nurtured from their sacs inevitably inherited the previous memory fragments.

From this perspective, these memory fragments have been indispensable for the Azure Dragon Race to develop a prototype civilization.

As for those companion individuals who have inherited the complete memories of previous dragons?

Memory undisturbed and coherent, they are more aware than ordinary dragons about their own existence significance.

.....

Above the clouds of Azure Dragon Island.

"Roar!"

Accompanied by an angry roar, the giant dragon that appeared earlier emerged from the clouds again.

It is the individual born alongside the Nether Spring dragon, inheriting the memories of previous generations of dragons.

The difference is solely in that the special individual hatched from the "Ghost God Egg," whereas it was born from an ordinary sac.

"As expected, it woke up!"

As anticipated, Kuilong raised his head to gaze at the sky, swiftly hurling the spherical lightning from his hand toward the clouds.

In an instant, electric light flickered, and thunder roared.

The unprepared dragon let out a wail, its body uncontrollably falling towards the direction of Azure Dragon Island.

Even a dragon capable of wielding thunder displays not much different from an ordinary creature when facing such powerful spherical lightning.

Fortunately, being one of this generation's resurrected dragons, the dragon had long activated the Ascension Ladder.

Crackle...

After a blinding arc flashed by, the dragon forcibly stayed suspended in mid-air.

Subsequently, a high-intensity electromagnetic field emanated from the dragon's body, with every power-storing cell working at full capacity.

Combining the hydrogen constantly generated within its body, the dragon was able to regain its capability to float in the air, summoning thunder for a fierce strike.

Rumble!

With a loud crash, a bolt of lightning struck down.

Although the energy of this bolt was slightly weaker compared to the spherical lightning hurled by Kuilong, it was still able to destroy half of Azure Dragon Island.

"Do you need my help?"

In this scenario, the Mountain Demon finally revealed a majestic expression befitting its ghost god identity.

This dragon might be formidable, but only limited to an ordinary Ascender sequence.

For the Mountain Demon, a ghost god specialized in the combat sequence, it is hardly considered a strong adversary.

"No need, lightning is my domain."

Casually rejecting the Mountain Demon's offer of assistance,

Kuilong first circled around, glancing at the trembling young dragons nearby, before looking up at the sky again.

"Using the power of lightning to attack me, I can only say you're a bit overconfident!"

As if confirming his words, just as Kuilong finished speaking, the descending lightning dissipated at a visible speed.

This is the power of the Divine Position, the Primordial Power of this world.

Surprise, bewilderment, even a trace of fear...

Before the dragon in the sky could respond, Kuilong's body had already rapidly expanded, becoming gigantic.

Boom!

In the blink of an eye.

A Celestial God wrapped in thunder appeared on Azure Dragon Island, capturing the dragon in the sky with one hand.

"Hiding behind the scenes, demigod, is this your limit?"

