

Chapter 24

Laura

I saw Jason finally leave my room, and as soon as he closed the door, I covered my mouth with my hands to stifle the big laugh I let out. I got up and went to my living room window and looked at the powerful view of Manhattan outside. Furthermore, I had a smile of satisfaction on my face, it was as if a great weight had been released from me as if words that had been stuck in my throat for all these years had finally left.

I felt free and fulfilled, it was simply too pleasurable to see Jason almost cry in front of me. "Wonderful!" I threw myself back into my chair and sat down, thinking.

Had Jason changed? Was he telling the truth? That was unlikely, but I was curious, so I picked up my cell phone and called Terence, Ava's husband, and my friend.

"Wow, wow. What happened today that the great diva is calling me?" Terence said that as soon as he answered, I laughed at him.

"Hi to you too, my friend. How long has it been, right?" I rarely spoke to Terence.

"Yes, since you forgot about me and only paid attention to my wife. That's the downside of being the male friend, I guess," he said humorously.

"You have to blame Ava, she's the one stealing all the attention."

"Yeah, I agree with you. Ava is irresistible," he said like a complete fool in love, making me laugh. It was so good to see that those two still loved each other so much even after so long, which is very different from Jason and me.

The four of us had gotten married at the same time and seemed to be two couples who were friends and confidants who looked out for each other and were always there for each other, but my marriage to Jason collapsed in such an unexpected way, which also shook Terence and Ava greatly because they were always there with us. But despite everything, they remained firm in their marriage. I was simply grateful to have the faithful friendship of those two.

"Did you want to talk to Ava? At that time she must be in her Yoga class, you know how she is," she said, and I chuckled in agreement.

"Yoga is great, but I'd like to talk to you."

"Hm, that's interesting. Do you have any gossip for me?" I laughed.

"Uh-hum, I do, and it's a good one."

"I can see by your excitement that the gossip is fantastic," he said, laughing. "Tell me, what happened?"

"It's about your thick-headed friend, Jason."

"Oh yes, he is a blockhead. What did he do this time?"

"I ended up meeting with him, but I think you already know that."

"I know. You keep Ava in the loop, and she in turn keeps me up-to-date. It's like a gossip network between couples, you know?" I laughed at that. I had told Ava every detail about the disastrous lunch at Charmé. "Tell me more, please. You and Jason got back together, he was a clown and everything, and then what happened?"

"He's been kind of flirting with me lately," I said, not being able to find another word to say it.

"Flirting on you?"

"Yes, can you believe something like that? He's coming with the strange talk, saying he's sorry and that he wants me back."

"Wanting you back? Did he say that?"

"That's right, he said."

"That crazy guy has decided."

"What do you mean?" I was curious. What would Jason be determined to do?

"He said he wants to win you back." My smile even weakened when I heard that. Was it true?

"Do you think he's telling the truth?"

"Well, Lau. As a spectator of your story, I can only tell you to follow your heart." Terence wanted to remain impartial. He might want me to start believing in Jason, but what if I went back to him and was hurt by him again? He would feel guilty about encouraging me to forgive Jason, which is why he wanted to remain impartial. I thought it was smart of him.

"I see. What about his marriage to Kendall? Is it true that that woman hit on him?"

"That's as true as a bright day outside, Lau. Jason got into some serious shit with that woman," Terence said, leaving me with torn thoughts.
