My Ex-Wife and Kids Came In Like A Wrecking Ball Chapter 1549- I Wanted To Get Them For You

Only then did Rosalie snap out of her thoughts.

The salesman smiled and said, "I don't have to get any other size. Your figure is almost the same as the mannequin. If you don't mind, I can take the clothes on the mannequin for you to try on."

Byron turned around to get Rosalie's opinion, making him look like a henpecked husband.

The salesman understood his intention and waited patiently for Rosalie's answer.

Feeling shy when she realized what was happening, Rosalie nodded with a smile.

The salesman took the suit and asked one of the staff to lead Byron to the fitting room. Meanwhile, he took Rosalie around the store and introduced her to each suit they had. Then, he observed which of the suit she looked at for the longest time.

A moment later, Byron walked out of the dressing room, wearing a smokegray shirt and a black suit. His back was straight, and his shoulders were broad.

When he got out, he went straight to Rosalie without looking into a mirror." How about this? Do you think it's nice?"

Rosalie was looking at the clothes with the salesman. She turned around upon hearing his voice.

She was mesmerized by the perfect-looking man before her.

Over the years, nothing seemed to have changed about Byron, but he seemed to have more charisma than before.

She could not get her eyes off him...

"Not as good as you expected?" Byron frowned and looked helpless. He turned around and wanted to get the staff to bring him another suit to try on.

Rosalie snapped out of her daze and smiled. "You look more handsome than I expected. This set suits you."

The salesman agreed. "Sir, you look good in any type of clothing."

Receiving Rosalie's appreciation, Byron nodded satisfactorily and said to the cashier, "Put this on the bill. I'll try on some other clothes."

What he meant was that he wanted to try on all the clothes the salesman brought over.

Rosalie was surprised upon hearing this. "Are you going to buy them all?"

Byron's clothes had filled his closet, and Rosalie did not think he needed to get so many more.

"Don't you want to see me wear these clothes? I'll wear all of them for you."

He sounded like he was doing something reasonable.

Rosalie looked at the man before her and was so touched that she was at a loss for words.

The salesman asked the staff to get a few more suits and told Byron, "When I accompanied your girlfriend to look around the store, she seemed to like these few."

Rosalie glanced at the suits and saw they were the few she was interested in. However, she did not tell the salesman about this. She had no idea how he knew...

As if noticing her doubts, the salesman smiled. "You looked at these clothes for a moment longer than the others."

Before Rosalie could react, Byron's voice sounded again.

"You have a gift in sales."

Then, he beckoned the staff. "Put all these on the bill for me."

The salesman and staff were delighted to have such a generous customer in their store but did not show it.

Rosalie took the bags of clothes and felt helpless.

Noticing her expression, Byron asked with concern, "What's the matter? Is there any of those that you don't like?"

Rosalie shook her head and approached him, lowering her voice somewhat awkwardly. "These many clothes are beyond my budget..."

Puzzled, Byron lifted his eyebrow. Then, he realized what she meant and smiled.

'They're for me. Why should you pay for them?'

Rosalie protested with a frown. "I want to get them for you."

Rosalie looked at the salesman embarrassedly as soon as she said that.

The salesman obviously heard her but did not say anything. Instead, he smiled politely at her.

Byron looked at Rosalie's panicked expression lovingly.

After a while, the staff came over with the packed clothes.

Byron took the clothes from the staff and told Rosalie, "I'll take them.

Rosie, you can get me the one I'm wearing now."

Then, he smiled and waited for Rosalie to answer him.

Rosalie's regret was not getting a chance to get Byron a suit six years ago. She would accept it now since Byron was allowing her to do so.

Byron wanted to test the rest of the clothes, but Rosalie stopped him."

Never mind..."

She glanced sheepishly at the salesman and the staff as she whispered to Byron, "You can put them on when we get back home and show me."

As if displeased that she could not immediately see him in other clothes, Byron paused for a few seconds before nodding.

Then, they went to pay for the clothes.

After shopping at the men's store, Byron took Rosalie to shops that sold women's clothes to get her some clothes too.

Rosalie quickly refused.

“You’ve bought enough clothes for me…”

She did not even know when Byron bought them.

When Rosalie moved into Lawrence Manor, she saw that half of Byron’s closet was filled with her clothes while the other half was filled with his. Every dress was new and expensive.

Used to wearing a white lab coat, Rosalie was shocked to see so many clothes and felt difficult getting used to them.

“I don’t need that many. Just two dresses are enough.”

That was what she told Byron back then.

Byron, however, put his arms around her from behind and explained to her by whispering, “You don’t need so many now, but as Mrs. Lawrence, those clothes aren’t enough.”¹

He was trying to use things to compensate for the loss he caused six years ago. Only with that could others notice how much he loved Rosalie.

Wearing the clothes he bought for her was also another way of showing she was his.

It was hard for Rosalie to reject him. The clothes were still hanging in the closet, and she wore only one every few days.

It would be a waste if they bought any more.

Byron held her hand and did not give her any chance to reject. He took her upstairs. Buying clothes for Rosalie was much easier than buying for himself.

Byron glanced at the store and decided which he wanted to buy. Rosalie did not even have to try the clothes. The staff packed the clothes, asked someone to send them to the parking lot, and put them in her car.

It was still early, and the two began to buy gifts for the little ones.

Lucian’s and Nox’s laptops were easy to get. Byron bought the latest models and got the accessories needed for them.

Meanwhile, Rosalie chose Estelle’s clothes.

Byron initially thought Rosalie would only buy a few sets of clothes.

However, Rosalie felt she had missed those years of accompanying Estelle and wanted to get as many as she could for her.

Besides, it would be inappropriate... if she bought only a few as Byron had bought so many clothes for her.
